

The Monad by C.W. Leadbeater (translated into feminine)

An excerpt

Yet let no one think, because this is so, that she is compelled from without to do this or that;

the compelling force is the real you;

none else than yourself can ever bind you at any stage of your growth.

And when the Monad has decided, the thing will be done;

it is well for the personality if she yields gracefully and readily -- if she recognizes the voice from above, and co-operates gladly -- for if she does not do this, she will lay up for herself much useless suffering.

It is always the woman herself who is doing this thing; and she, in the personality, has to realize that the ego is herself, and she has for the moment to take it for granted that the Monad is still more herself – the final and greatest expression of her.

Surely this view should be the greatest possible encouragement to the woman working down here, this knowledge that she is a far grander and more glorious being in reality than she appears to be, and that there is a part of her - enormously the greater part – which has already achieved what she, as a personality, is trying to achieve;

and that all that she has to do down here is to try to make herself a perfect channel for this higher and more real self;

to do her work and to try to help others in order that she may be a factor, however microscopic, in forwarding the evolution of the world.

For she who knows,

there is no question of the saving of the soul;

the true woman behind needs no salvation;

she needs only that the lower self should realize her and express her.

She is herself already divine;

and all that she needs is to be able to realize herself in all the worlds and at all possible levels,

so that in them

all the Divine Power through her may work equally, and so God shall be all in all.